Lincoln University Sports Scholarship Regulations

Vision Statement

To be the University of choice for sporting and academic excellence

Mission Statement

To educate and develop successful student athletes

Introduction

The Sport Scholarships were established in 1999 to assist students of high sporting achievement to undertake tertiary study and sporting development at Lincoln University.

The regulations outline the criteria by which the scholarship is administered and by which satisfactory participation in the Sports Scholarship Programme will be assessed. They also describe the steps that will be taken by the University should any criteria not be met by a scholar.

Scholars should also refer to the Sports Scholar Code of Conduct and the Code of Conduct Guidelines, which provide more detailed information about conduct required of Sports scholars and how this is assessed.

The University works with the following Sports Code Partners: Crusaders Rugby, Netball Mainland, Canterbury Basketball, Canterbury Cricket, Canterbury Rowing, Canterbury Hockey and other sports partners involved with the delivery of the Elite Sports Scholarships. Sports scholars receive tuition fees or an accommodation grant, athletic development and sporting development. Scholars are assessed throughout the year to ensure that they continue to meet the conditions of the scholarship and are given regular feedback in the forms outlined below.

In general, a higher standard of academic performance, individual development and personal conduct is expected of Sports scholars than of the wider student body. These regulations ensure that this high standard is maintained.

Sports Scholarship Programme

Scholars' Code of Conduct Guidelines

These guidelines are designed to help Sports Scholars understand what is expected from them as signatories to the Code of Conduct, and to offer examples of ways in which you can regulate your behaviour, in person and online, in order to fulfil the requirements of the Code of Conduct.

All staff and students of Lincoln University are subject to the University's Calendar regulations, which cover academic and disciplinary matters, including misconduct, and to Lincoln University Policies and Procedures (available here <http://www.lincoln.ac.nz/footer/Policies--Procedures/?sti=1>).

Sports scholars are further subject to the Sports Scholarship Regulations and the Code of Conduct. These place additional obligations on you in terms of your academic achievement and personal conduct at Lincoln University. While these are designed to empower rather than restrict you, they do include some elements that require you to approach some matters of conduct differently than you may have done before.

The Code of Conduct applies to any in-person interaction in which you may reasonably be understood to be representing Lincoln University. This includes your usual everyday interactions with other students and staff, but also any environment in which you might be recognised as a Sports scholar. These include

- University events in which you are participating or at which you are present
- Out-of-session activities, including field trips, volunteer work and employment, in which you participate while on the scholarship
- Social events and activities at which staff, students or members of the public are present where your identity as a Sports Scholar may be known or inferred.

So for example, at activities with family members or while on holiday you would not normally be obliged to fulfil the terms of the Code of Conduct, but on a work placement, at large in Lincoln township, at a house party or in a bar or pub you would be.

The same considerations apply to online interactions. Most Sports scholars have grown up with a life online, so it may seem counter-intuitive to think of online spaces as particularly vulnerable to breaches of the Code of Conduct. It is the case, however, that text-, image- and video-based interactions have a longer life than their equivalent in-person interactions, and the University expects a greater amount of caution and discretion as a result.

In general, private one-to-one interactions online, whether through email, direct message, private message, text message, video communication or telephone call are outside the limits of the Code of Conduct. The University respects the privacy of these intimate communications. However, online communication that involves the following is more permeable, and as such is covered by the Code of Conduct:

- Group emails, group chats or group messages (including via SnapChat and other temporary messaging services)
- Private or public social media use including closed groups or locked accounts (whether posting from or posting to, and including Facebook groups, WhatsApp group chats, Instagram accounts, YouTube accounts, Twitter accounts and news and other websites).

Be aware, also, of the actions of those to whom the Code of Conduct does not apply, such as people using social media at private house parties, where it is possible for your required conduct as a Sports scholar to be compromised through someone else's social media use. Disinhibition brought on by alcohol and other drugs obviously compounds the risk. This is important to remember throughout the year and especially when you are under academic pressure and in need of rest and recreation.

Finally, as a Sports Scholar you should not respond to negative comments about yourself or other student athletes or teammates on social media. Any comments of this kind should be discussed with the Sports Scholarship Manager.

The Code of Conduct requires that you uphold your own reputation, the reputation of the Sports Scholarship Programme and of Lincoln University, online and in person. You have the opportunity to make your personal reputation through the Sports programme, and the Code of Conduct is designed to help you do this. Make sure that your actions contribute to your reputation as a sports scholar, now and in future.
